Danbury public schools district page

Photo: shutterstock.com I don't need children to understand that good public schools support the value of homes in their area. And while higher-quality schools tend to be accompanied by higher property taxes, homeowners in such neighborhoods end up paying off through higher home sales. Paying you sounds good, but what are we talking about? A new survey Realtor.com shows that for access to a desirable school district, 9% of buyers say they will pay 11% to 20% over budget. Separately, 17% said they would pay extra to keep them close enough that their children could walk to and from school. Realtor.com found that 62% of buyers would submit a spa if it meant getting into the right school district. 50% will provide easy access to shopping, while 44% will give up space in the form of a bonus room. If the house you plan to sell is located in a highly coveted school district, do everything in your power to highlight this fact in all your real estate marketing materials. Many potential buyers are the parents of children currently in the school system, so be sure to get a say among neighbors and local friends. If you're buying a home, use a search tool that allows you to filter by school district, since the boundaries of the area don't always align with city lines and city lines. After all, you can not assume that your children will be assigned to attend the same school as children down the block or even next door. Armstrong Roberts/ClassicStock/ArchivePhotos/Getty Images To find the school district associated with any home address in the U.S., go to GreatSchools.org and enter the address in the Interactive School District and Map Borders. Then find the name of the school district to get the county's phone number, and call the district to confirm. After visiting the GreatSchools.org to get the name of the area, visit the neighborhood's website. Many public schools have interactive school-finding apps that allow families to enter their home address and get a list of relevant primary, secondary and secondary schools. At least most have maps showing border lines of the area. It is useful to take this step, since the areas of school attendance can change from year to year, so the information collected from neighbors, brokers and other local sources may not be accurate. In addition, most state Departments of Education carry lists of each county in the organized in alphabetical order, or by district number, and often have maps showing boundary lines for each area. Here you can also find demographic data about the area, average test scores, school grades and other useful information. As a final step, call the school district office, and ask to speak to an enrollment specialist who will help find a suitable school for every child in the family. Family.
